The WPA was popular at the time, and the clock towers were a WPA creation. The "1" in the clock hands, meant to represent an upraised hand, represented the WPA. About 20,000 people moved into the complex, and the WPA was replaced with a police force that consisted of all-white officers. Hundreds of people were arrested in the raids. The clock tower project, intended to attract visitors to the new Jefferson Memorial, was also plagued by problems, and was never completed. What would have become the highest structure in Washington, at 106 feet, was finally completed in 1933. Opposition to the WPA But it wasn't until 1937 that Congress finally ended the WPA, and though the project to preserve the clock towers was built, and the project's towers remained in the air until after the end of World War II, the WPA was eventually replaced by a more direct government approach. "If you go up to the tallest clock tower, you can look up, and if you look up high enough you can see the dome of the Capitol," said William J. Tuthill, a D.C. architect who has worked on the project. What the WPA did, was give Washington a face, said Tuthill. "The WPA added to a lot of the aesthetic quality of the city," he said. The WPA's effect is still felt today. The WPA had a mission to improve the lives of the poor, and there were certainly a lot of people living in poverty then. The lives of the poor were the city's responsibility. And many of the WPA buildings were intended to have a positive effect on the lives of people who were poor. "We are faced with a social and moral problem today, not to say that it's not a problem back then," said T 82157476af
